Taungyo in Myanmar

Centered in the township of Pinlon, the Taungyo people live primarily in Myanmar's southern Shan State. Ethnically, they are a sub-group of the majority Burmese (or, Bamar) people although their dialect of Burmese is non-standard. The Taungyo maintain themselves as a unique people group, though they still live intermingled with other ethnicities. One way to pick out the Taungyo is by the distinctive apparel of the women – lots of silver on their jewelry and heavy brass rings on their legs that are used to signify their marital status. The Taungyo are fishermen and agriculturalists.

Ministry Obstacles

Though some outreach is being performed by local evangelists and missionaries from other people groups, the Taungyo are almost entirely Buddhist. Buddhism centers around the pursuit of perfection, achieved over lifetimes of effort. It will be difficult for them to accept the idea that they need a sin-free savior, who alone is perfect.

Outreach Ideas

Though the Taungyo people may not be drawn by printed material, audio and video materials might be very effective.
