

The Kwomtari of Papua New Guinea

The march of technological advancements across Papua New Guinea has left in its wake unexpected influences that are eroding culture, challenging belief systems and leaving broken families in their wake among the Kwomtari people.

Many Kwomtari cannot handle the increase of information and temptations introduced by new roads, internet access and modern media. The youth are being influenced and are less satisfied. They are leaving their villages to find education and jobs while often ending up with neither.

The Kwomtari people are one of a large number of tiny population language groups in the Sepik region of Papua New Guinea. To complicate matters, traditional practices of paybacks and compensations control their actions. Though folks believe they are Christians, when trouble comes they default back into the pattern of ancestor worship and incantations.

For the Kwomtari, there is only one thing to save people from perpetuating this same cycle for generations – God’s Word. Jesus explained, “You are truly my disciples if you remain faithful to my teachings. And you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free” (John 8:31b-32, NLT).

Families grow their own yams, taro and other garden vegetables. They supplement their income from the sale of cocoa harvests.

Representative photo

Primary Religion:

Christianity

Disciples (Matt 28:19):

5%

Churches:

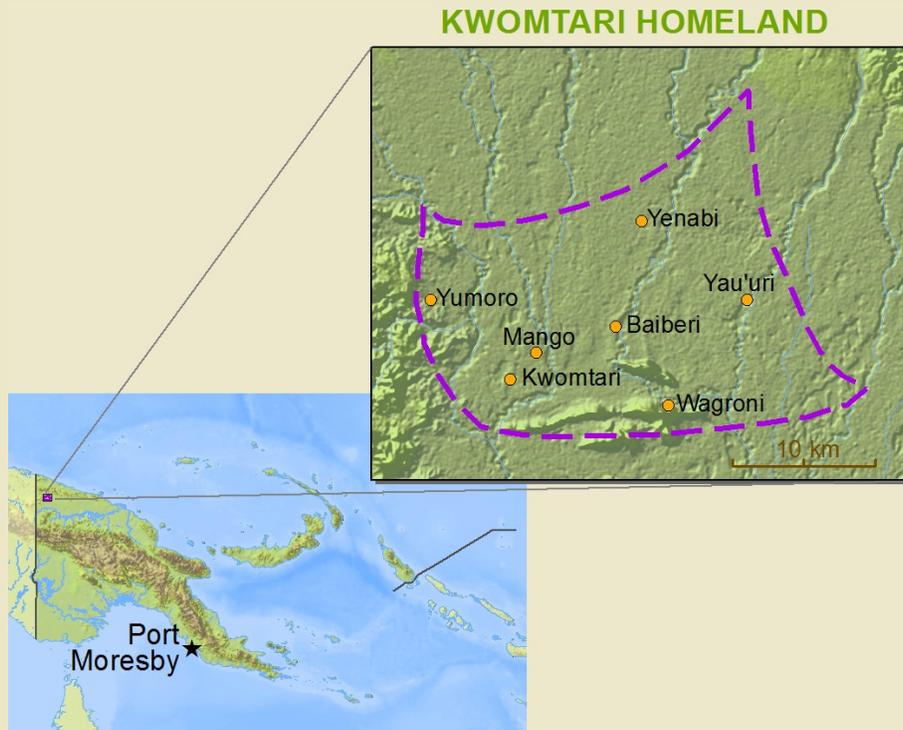

Yes

Scripture Status (Matt 28:20):

In progress

Population (date):

600 (1998)

The Kwomtari of Papua New Guinea

Have They Heard The Gospel?

Is The Word Of God Translated?

Young people asked to be taught how to tell Bible stories. The delegates ran from village to village, spreading God's Word. "If church was like this every Sunday," explained a village elder, "I would be here every Sunday morning and evening!" The solution is simple. After two years of training storytellers and receiving reports of success, seasoned storytellers will now teach, train and work with new delegates.